Availability of Attorney's Fees in Coverage Actions

In the United States, recovery of attorney's fees is generally subject to the "American Rule," which states that litigants in a lawsuit bear their own costs.¹ There are exceptions to this rule that usually arise in the context of statutory law or in accordance with a contractual agreement between the litigants.² Most states allow prevailing parties in insurance disputes also to recover their attorney's fees. But the scope and terms of recovery vary from state to state.

This survey identifies jurisdictions that allow and do not allow recovery of attorney's fees in insurance coverage litigation and identifies whether the right to recover fees arises by statute or by operation of common law.

¹See Broadnax v. New Haven, 851 A.2d 1113, 1141 (Conn. 2004) ("The general rule of law known as the American rule is that attorney's fees and ordinary expenses and burdens of litigation are not allowed to the successful party absent a contractual or statutory exception.")

²ACMAT Corp. v. Greater New York Mut. Ins. Co., 282 923 A.2d 697, 702 (Conn. 2007) ("[A] specific contractual terms may provide for the recovery of attorney's fees and costs . . . or a statute may confer such rights.").
